PRICE FOURPENCE.

"The economic organon brings to bear the accumulated strength of much of the best genius of many generations of men. It shows how to analyse the motives at work, how to group them, how to trace their mutual relations. And thus, by introducing systematic and organized methods of reasoning, it enables us to deal with this one side of the problem with greater force and certainty than almost any other side; although it would have probably been the most unmanageable side of all without such aid. Having done its work it retires and leaves to common sense the responsibility of the ultimate decision; not standing in the way of, or pushing out any other kind of knowledge, not hampering common sense in the use to which it is able to put any other available knowledge, nor in any way hindering; helping where it could help, and for the rest keeping silence."

Alfred Marshall.

NOTE.

THE Books dealing with Social and Economic Subjects have always been the strongest part of this Library; and they have more than an ordinary interest attached to them from the fact that the majority of the volumes in this Section have come from the hands of Students of Social and Economic Problems. By far the greater proportion are from the Library of MR. BOLTON KING; and among MR. KING's collection are some pamphlets relating to English social movements, which are, in many cases, now out of print and inaccessible.

I have to thank MR. J. MACFARLANE, of the British Museum, and MR. ERNEST AVES, for invaluable help in the preparation of this list.

"It is difficult to describe in general terms the position of the younger economists. They differ from one another in the emphasis they lay on this or that idea, and some of them go to extremes in reaction. But the general conclusions to which they come may perhaps be fairly stated thus: a Political Economy is possible which shall be of real value to society; in it the old doctrines will be shewn to be not untrue, but to have only a relative truth, and to deserve a much less important place than has been assigned to them; and the direction for fruitful work is no longer in the pursuit of the abstract deductive method which has done as much service as it is capable of, but in following new methods of investigation—historical, statistical, inductive."
